Cell Phones on planes? Is not flying one of the now most difficult experiences one has to endure these days already, without people on either side of you conducting intense, maybe even terse work conversations, right next to you? What a great way to start a vacation. Or what about flying home on the red eye after working 3 20 hour shifts with some useless chatter chiming in your ear? What about trying to hear something important over the din of 40 people (or more?), with probably poor reception problems, yelling into their cell phones? What about transatlantic flights when most people want to sleep? What about the risks it creates with all this terroism?
I vote, unless we can accomodate these people away from all the other seated passengers, "no".
